

Optical Sectioning without Lasers

A kinder environment for your live cells

Over the last two decades optical sectioning microscopy has become increasingly important. The most common imaging tool is the laser scanning microscope. This talk will introduce non-laser based optical sectioning techniques using aperture correlation and structured illumination. These systems are less damaging to live cells and less complex to use.